

Redistricting poll: Georgia voters strongly favor competitive districts that preserve their communities and reflect our diverse population.

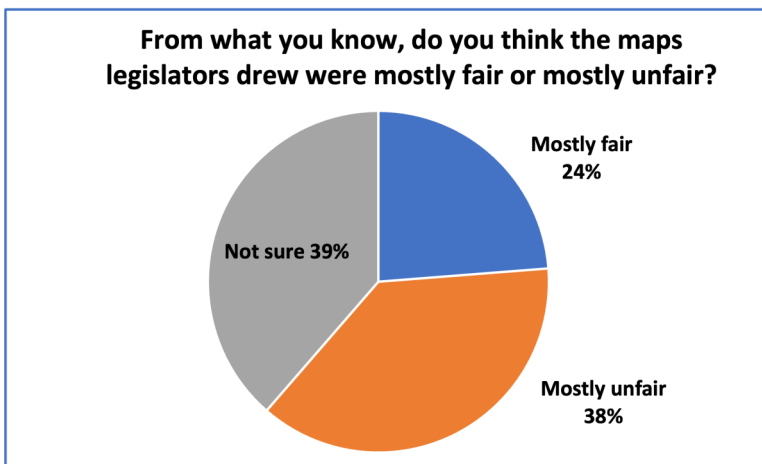

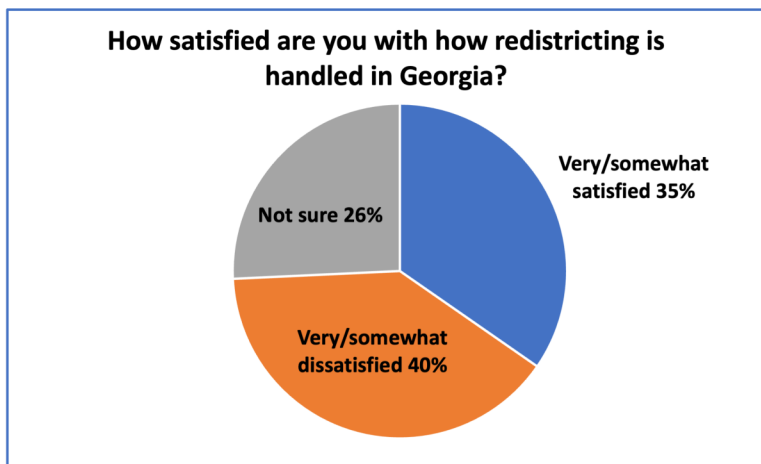

Key Findings

- Overwhelming majority of voters from both political parties favor competitive districts that preserve their communities
- Large majority among all racial groups favor maps that reflect racial diversity. Opinions differ by political affiliation.
- Georgians have low confidence in fairness of current maps and low satisfaction with map-drawing process
- Significant majority favor new law mandating non-partisan process. Majority support independent redistricting commission.

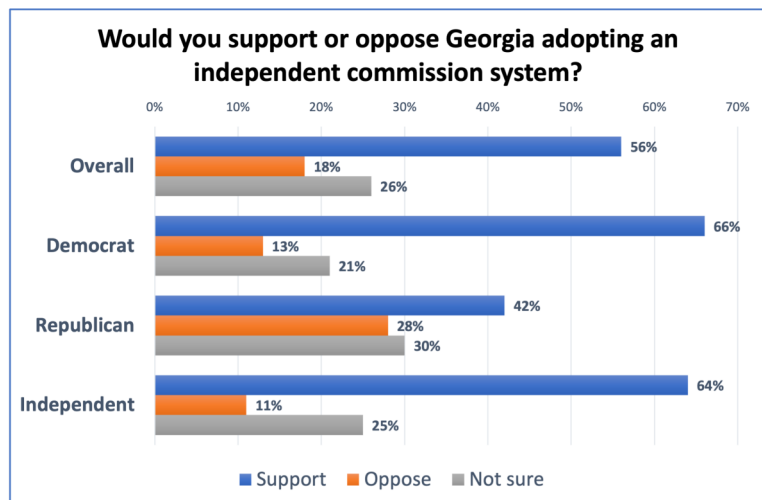

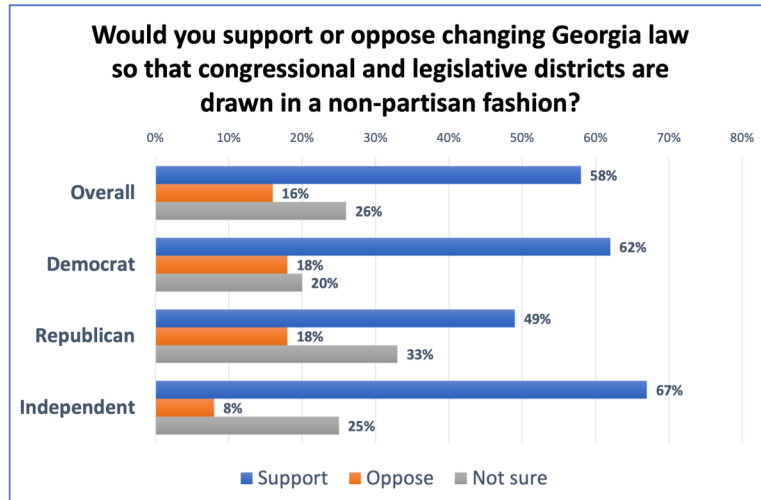

Redistricting poll: Georgians have little confidence in fairness of current redistricting method, strongly favor law mandating non-partisan mapping and/or independent redistricting commission.

Georgians have low confidence in fairness of current maps and low satisfaction with map-drawing process. Far less than a majority are satisfied with the process and think maps are fair.

Significant majority across parties favor changing the law to mandate a non-partisan process. Majority support independent commission for drawing maps.

VOTER AWARENESS OF REDISTRICTING

Percent of voters reading or hearing “a lot” or “some” about redistricting is 57%, higher among Democrats (67%) than Independents (52%) and Republicans (48%).

Fifty-two percent of Republicans have heard “just a little” or “nothing” about redistricting, resulting in higher “unsure” responses for map fairness (49%), satisfaction with the process (36%) and support for non-partisan reforms (33%).